From the Washington Post

The early resignation of Secretary Whitney may be looked for. Indeed, there is an impression among the fidelials in the Navy Department that affer his present vacation has will not return to the Department except to write his annual report. If it were not for his desire to see this annual report. If it were not for his desire to see this annual report out it is believed that the Department would see him no more as Secretary. Before leaving the city he fold a front that he was heartly fired of office, not because the work was no laborious, or because of his health, for his health was capital, and had been continuously so for some time. "But, to tell you the truth," said the Secretary, "I have no political amortion. Public office is not profitable, and it has no attractions for me. I cannot say it was against my will, but I will say it was by no means to secondance with any design of my own that I came to Washington to accept the office is not profitable, and it has no attractions for me.
